“Palestine Square” Institute for Palestine Studies Launches New Blog

March 18, 2015 – Today, the Institute for Palestine Studies is launching its first ever blog! Join us at Palestine Square for expert analysis on Palestinian affairs, exclusive interviews with Palestinian artists and filmmakers, and much more. Palestine Square, found at blog.palestine-studies.org is an online destination for all those interested in Palestine.

Palestine Square brings together scholars, artists and youth voices to expand knowledge on Palestinian affairs across diverse communities and beyond traditional media. In partnership with the renowned scholarly journal, the Journal of Palestine Studies, the new blog features content from Palestine Unbound – a section of the journal highlighting the ever expanding realm of online discussion on Palestine and Israel.

Palestine Square evokes a meeting place akin to a town’s public square. It is neither static nor monotonous, but dynamic and diverse. This is not a mere slogan, but rather a mission and an invitation. Palestine Square asks writers and thinkers dedicated to studying the Arab-Israeli conflict to join us in the Square and submit comments and content to be published on the blog.

We hope Palestine Square will inspire readers to consider the conflict from new perspectives rooted in the value of equal rights. The launch of Palestine Square features exclusive and exciting interviews with Palestinian artists, Steve Sabella and Mischa Hiller along with Palestine Unbound videos, articles and photographs straight from the Journal of Palestine Studies.

Altogether, Palestine Square represents the intersection of politics and art with plenty to offer readers and where all those concerned with Palestinian affairs will find a forum both accessible and rich in detail.
